

About the Contributors

Maria Ela L. Atienza is associate professor at the Department of Political Science, University of the Philippines-Diliman and Fellow at the Institute for Strategic and Development Studies. She finished her Ph.D. in political science at Kobe University under a Monbusho scholarship. She wrote her dissertation on health devolution in the Philippines.

Renato Cruz De Castro is currently chair of the International Studies Department, De La Salle University and holder of the Aurelio Calderon Professorial Chair of Philippine-American Relations. He earned his Ph.D. from the Government and International Studies Department of the University of South Carolina as a Fulbright scholar. He has written several articles on international relations and security published in a number of scholarly journals in the Philippines, Singapore, Taiwan, Germany, and the United States.

Rosalie Arcala Hall is assistant professor at the University of the Philippines in Visayas, Iloilo. She earned her Ph.D. in Public and International Affairs at Northeastern University, Boston, Massachusetts, U.S.A. She recently completed a U.P. CIDS-funded research on local civil-military relations in counterinsurgency operations and has been awarded the Asian Public Intellectual Fellowship to study the politics of peacekeeping deployment of the Japanese Self Defense Forces.

Charmaine Misalucha is assistant professor at the International Studies Department of De La Salle University, Manila. She holds a master's degree in International Studies. Her research interests include arms control, Third World security, and Southeast Asia.

Jorge V. Tigno is associate professor at the Department of Political Science, University of the Philippines-Diliman. He is currently the President of the Philippine Political Science Association. He received his doctorate in public administration (DPA) from the U.P. National College of Public Administration and Governance and has written articles on transnational migration and local governance.

Crisline G. Torres is assistant professor at the Department of Political Science, University of the Philippines-Diliman. Her main research interest is the constitutional design of political systems, particularly the form of government in a democracy. Her article in this issue forms part of a more extensive research agenda assessing the major arguments of the pro-parliamentary position in the Philippines in light of the comparative constitutional design literature.