

About the Contributors

Reynaldo C. Ileto is professor of Southeast Asian Studies at the National University of Singapore. He is the author of Pasyon and Rebolusyon: Popular Movements in the Philippines, 1840-1910 (2nd edition, 1987), and Filipinos and their Revolution: Event, Discourse, and Historiography (1998).

Herman Joseph S. Kraft is assistant professor of political science at the University of the Philippines and fellow of the Institute for Strategic and Development Studies. He is a Ph.D. candidate at York University, Toronto.

Julio C. Teehankee is associate professor and chair of the Department of Political Science at De La Salle University (DLSU). He holds an M.A. in political science from the University of the Philippines and recently finished his Ph.D. in Development Studies at DLSU.

Yoshiki Seki is a research associate at the Institute of Asia-Pacific Studies at Waseda University, Tokyo. He was affiliated with the Institute of Philippine Culture, Ateneo de Manila in 1997-1998 and did field research on the Community-Based Forest Management Program.

Mary Ann O. Arguillas, a former career Philippine foreign service officer, is with the Southeast Asian Studies Program of the National University of Singapore (NUS). She has a B.S. in Foreign Service (1976) from the University of the Philippines; a certificate in diplomacy from Oxford University (1984); and an M.A. in Southeast Asian Studies (2001) from NUS.

Takeshi Kawanaka, is a researcher at the Institute of Developing Economies, Tokyo. He published a pioneering study on the local politics of Naga City under Mayor Robredo and is now finishing a book on local governance in the Philippines.